Excerpt: .a perfectly typical one--narrow (and certainly not over clean), in close proximity to the principal thoroughfares of the district, and consisting, for the most part, of small shops with three storeys of single and double room tenements overhead. The character of the street is reflected in the size and character of the public-houses in it. These are in no case large, but represent very fairly the average public-house in the neighbourhood. My object in watching these houses was threefold. First, to ascertain the extent to which they were used, i.e, the number of persons entering; secondly, the hours at which they were fullest and busiest; and, thirdly, the character of the trade done. Two of the houses, A, and B, were watched on a Saturday in June. The first of them was watched for three and a half hours, i.e., from 12.30 p.m. to 4.0 p.m. During this time some 344 persons entered, representing an average of 98 per hour. Of these, seventy-nine, or less than one fourth, went in with jugs and cans, and this despite the fact that part of the time covered by these figures, i.e., from 12.30 p.m. to 2 p.m., includes the ordinary dinner hour of the working classes, so that the extent to which the ordinary public-house is a house of call, or a centre for social drinking becomes at least approximately apparent. The extent to which the custom of treating still prevails among the working classes was...
