Excerpt: . . . matching rates by 6 and 8 percentage points, respectively. In all four specifications, the probability of matching is generally increasing with the ability level measured as degree attainment rather than showing the bell-shaped relationship. This supports the hypothesis that matching is a preferred option for employment and proves that the voluntary withdrawals from matching because trainees prefer non-match jobs are not a significant portion of matching failure. Some might argue that training completion is a better indicator of training success. However, the endogeneity of training completion prevents us from achieving meaningful information about selection into matching. Whether a trainee withdraws from training program because he she considers a match as undesirable (high-ability trainees) or unattainable (low-ability trainees), early withdrawal is highly correlated with matching failure. For this reason, I use training completion as a control variable rather than a proxy for training success. In all specifications, completion of training is very significant. Considering that the matching rate for the sample studied here is 37. 82 , completion of training raising the chance of matching by 17 to 20 percentage points, depending on specifications, is substantial. However, whether training completion is controlled or not does not change the coefficients on educational degree attainments. The result that matching is the preferred option of employment is not affected. Another piece of evidence that supports that matching is a preferred option for employment is the increasing coefficients on the exit years over time. Labor market was the least favorable in 2004 and gradually improved over time...
