Excerpt: . elapsed, he was glad to make signs he was* perfectly satisfied. In consequence of Jack s taking the lead, he fought in a spirited manner, and left the ground without a scratch upon his face. Payne fought with the Moulder, at Sheppertonrange, on Tuesday, September 30, 1817. This was considered a tolerably good fight, and was spiritedly contested for nearly an hour. Some heavy blows passed between them; and in one particular instance, the Moulder put in so tremendous a bit that nearly look all the fight out of Jack, and his backers began to quake for fear the old system of his falling off was at hand: however, he recovered himself, and won the battle cleverly. From these two battles he was rather gaining ground in the opinion of the Fancy; but his memorable burlesque with Burke (see page 413) proved a...
