Excerpt: . . . could so soon be found for the difficulty that had appeared insurmountable only an hour before. Here was a way by which her mother would be relieved from anxiety as to her future home; she herself would be enabled to perform a daughters part towards her beloved parent, and Madame Dervilles burden of care and toil would be shared and lightened. Madame Pierard was a good woman: during her married life she had become accustomed to yield unquestioning submission to a rather domineering and obstinate husband; but she was given to fret about little things, had a great many small manias of her own, and was, unfortunately, addicted to disagreeing with all her three sons-in-law. Madame Andre was fully aware of her mothers weak points, and did not fail to ask herself whether it would be possible for her to live amicably with Madame Derville, who was accustomed to reign supreme mistress of all around her. But the temptation was strong, and the prospect of giving her mother a home so alluring, that she banished all fears, and accepted, with genuine gratitude, Madame Dervilles proposition. You are too good! too good! she exclaimed; but, if you think it possible, it will be a great joy for me. My mother could not assist us in the school, --in fact, she did not even teach us to read; but she has excellent sense, and is thoroughly capable of taking care of a large family. There were a...
