I know it, too, said the clergyman; you have acted perfectly right, and I respect you very much; more I cannot say now. I cannot at this moment give the matter the thought it requires. But this I will do; I will go down to the Lion to-night, and see Mr. Bentley, and get him to keep this situation open, in case either of you may accept it a little later, though you cannot quite make up your minds to do so now; and I will see Hal, and tell him what I think his duty is in this matter. I am right in supposing, that if the two places were at your disposal this moment, and you had none to think of but yourself, Mary, and the children, you would choose mine; am I not? Yes, sir, said Joe, so emphatically that...
